Excerpt from A Contribution to the Study of the Microbe of Rabbit Septicaemia The presence of the microbe in the internal organs may be easily demonstrated in sections of tissues hardened in absolute alcohol, They appear very well when the sections are stained over night in aniline water methyl violet and subsequently treated with a: acetic acid, alcohol and turpentine, and mounted in xylol balsam. They appear as a rule somewhat smaller than in cover-glass preparations and do not show the polar stain very clearly. In sections of the spleen they are found in groups in the pulp, but not in the malpighian corpuscles. In the kidney they seem to be limited to the larger blood vessels, where they lie scattered among the blood corpuscles. In the liver they occupy the capillaries of the acini in extensive groups. By carefully focussing, these groups are resolved into flat layers attached to the walls of the vessels, but never into plugs clogging them.
