Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from A Superheat Meter or Differential Thermometer for Airships The term superheat as used in relation to lighter-than-air craft is defined as the difference between the temperature of the lifting gas and air within the balloon envelope and that of the external air. If the gas temperature is higher than that of the free air, the super heat is termed positive if the free air temperature is the higher, it is considered negative. The importance of a knowledge of super heat in maneuvering an airship is evident when the dependence of the lift or buoyancy on this quantity is appreciated.
