In this retelling of the Orpheus myth, a man returns to the Aegean after losing his beloved in the sea over a decade ago. He returns in order to feel her presence, which he believes arises from the mysterious music of the ocean. He realizes that the music allows his memories of her to resurface and take him deeper into an endless horizon that he believes will allow him to be reunited with her. The reckoning of the minutes and the hours occurs in the brief moment when he thinks he has finally allowed time to bring him back to her. But he feels her absence seep into him once more, and the sea shines as brilliantly as it did at the beginning of his mind's secret millennium. A thousand summers have made him relive kiss after kiss, ghostly embrace after ghostly embrace. She always flees from his touch, and his eyes cry out for the mere sight of her. The images come all at once: the infinite blue sea, the unending sparkles of sunlight, the clear open sky, and...
